The magazine is published on a fortnightly basis and contains stories, articles, An encoder-decoder pair which communicates with a client using some coding scheme is well known in the prior art. In one instance, the encoder-decoder pair may be used to charge, debit and credit a client account for services rendered. In another instance, the encoder-decoder pair may be used to identify a vehicle and/or the location of a vehicle by broadcasting a unique identification code. In the prior art, and more particularly, in the prior art relating to telematics units within vehicles, the encoder-decoder pair was an analogue system that communicated using the analogue audio system of the vehicle. As will be understood by one skilled in the art, the digital nature of the internet presents tremendous opportunities to expand the use of telematics services and to provide greater service to vehicles. As will be understood by one skilled in the art, the digital nature of the internet allows for much more data to be broadcast from the telematics unit than was available in the past. This much increased data availability presents a problem for an encoder-decoder pair, as the encoder-decoder pair needs to be able to accommodate a much greater volume of data than was possible in the past. As is known to one skilled in the art, the digital nature of the internet facilitates the use of data compression. Data compression techniques greatly reduces the amount of data that needs to be transmitted. The need to accommodate a greater amount of data would be easily solved if a suitable compression system could be developed. However, as will be understood by one skilled in the art, using digital techniques in a telematics unit presents a design challenge. The digital encoding of the data requires that the telematics unit be relatively complex in order to achieve a data encoding that is suitable for communications over the Internet. It is desirable to provide an encoder-decoder pair which is capable of efficiently and conveniently communicating a substantially high volume of data from a telematics unit over the
